Conductor Meets with an Accident While Driving Tramps Off the Car. Conductor Morris Nobbs of the Union Pa eific met with a painful accident at Kearney Wednesday night, by which he lost his left hand. When the eastbound passenger train No. 1 stopped at Kearney, he attempted to put off couple of tramps who were on one of the baggage cars stealing a ride. He succeeded in driving the men off, but just as the train was pulling out of the station, they resumed

The car was one denominated as a "blind" baggage, and when the conductor discovered the men he stepped off the platform of the forward coach and attempted to gain the forward coach and attempted to gain the platform on which they were riding. In catching hold of the rail his foot slipped, he fell partly under the car, the wheels passing over the fingers of his hand. It was found necessary to amputate the hand at the wrist Held to the District Court.

Jesse James, the colored man who is alleged to have assaulted William Whalen with a knife and cut him severely on the throat, was bound over to the district court in the aum of $600. The trial in police court consumed most all of Wednesday and the greater parcel. greater part of yesterday. What is more attractive than a pretty face with a fresh, bright complexion? For it, use Perzoni's Powder.

Copyright, 1895, by Bacheller, Johnson & Bach-

Amid a tornado of excitement the winner darted under the wire, winner by a head. On the grand stand ladies and gentlemen begrudge what I lost. Give me a light. You must be made of wood, to be able to look at a heat like that and keep your cigar going. Two hundred out. Just my luck. The favorites I bet against were birds; those I backed, turned out pigs. It was always the rule. What did you lose?"

"Well; that's not so bad."
"No. The other fellow's losses never are." "I meant that it wasn't much. "Relatively, no. Actually, it couldn't have been more."

"How so?" "Because it was the Omega, the finls, the last rose of summer."
"As Baron Glebeel says, Till be ghostet" if I understand you. "It is very simple. I took account of stock this morning. One fifty dollar bill and some oose silver, not much. It seemed to me the time was ripe for a project I've been rolling around in my mind, and I made that bill my question to Fate. The oracle says 'Go ahead.'"

"What an oversight not to have arranged it so that the oracle's affirmative would have made you a winner.' "Impossible. I could not do what I purpose while I had anything left."

"It seems to me a fifty would come handy inder any circumstances."

Neither noticed that their conversation had been listened to, with evident interest, by two ladies scated just behind them, one an elderly woman with a shrewd but kindly face and th other an exceedingly handsome girl, or that the latter, when their backs were turned, stood up looking eagerly for some one amid the bank of faces above and behind her. Had they observed her, they would have seen that she found the face she sought, glanced a satisfied smile. "For the land's sake!" exclaimed the older lady. "Did you ever hear of a prodigal son like that one? His last dollar! And what do you suppose he's going to do? guess. He's going home for some fatted calf A good twisted strip of its hide is all he ought to get. I wonder who he is."

"Not now. But Amy Thorpe does." "How do you know?"
"She has just told me so." Miss Keturah Truefitt looked puzzled and relapsed into silence. When she speke again her voice was softer. "Poor young chap!" she said, meditatively. "Like as not he's had no mother's care to guide him right He's been led astray like many. And what a pity it is; he's a handsome, manly fellow m't he, Constance?"
"I-I didn't notice," answered the girl, hesitatingly. The loud clanging of the judges' bell, call-ing up the horses for the next race, put a stop to further conversation.

Miss Constance Dessine spent part of the succeeding summer at Long Branch, part at Saratoga and part at Bar Harbor, not a little to the disgruntlement of Aunt Keturah True-fitt, her chaperon, who heartily disliked so much flitting about in hot weather. "I can't see what possesses you this summer, Con-stance," she protested, "unless it's the un-easy, roving spirit of your French father workin' out. He was like Noah's dove that found no rest anywhere for its feet, only the love did go back to the ark and settle down, while he never settled anywhere, until he died. You don't take after the Truefitts; not a mite. They were always great on stayin' where the Lord put them. Your mother, Almiry, was never twenty miles from West Framingham until your father came along and courted and married her, all in a whirl, as you may say, and whisked her off. If that husband of hers, Victor Dessine, had comewhere else?"

Constance would not admit that she was. Even Amy Thorpe, her most confidential friend, could only guess from her frequent nquiries by letter, "whether the missing man had yet been found," what was the hope inspiring her unrest. Amy had not been able to tell her much about "Jack." He was a friend of her brother, Ross Thorpe, and she knew him, but that was about all. His name was John Burroughs and he had and faint 300 feet above the pavement. At the inherited, only a year or two ago, an estate same instant seemingly the cable hook gave f over $1,000,000 from his father. If he had spent it already he must be an awful spendthrift, but Amy did not think he was. One thing certain was that he had disappeared as completely as if he had left the planet. Even Ross, who had been his

The home stretch and space about the judge's stand were filled by a surging crowd of men, who joined in a mighty yell when the official announcement went up on the blackboard. Calm returned gradually and people taiked of what they had won, or lost.

"It was a grand race," exclaimed a young man, seated in the front row on the grand stand, addressing a comrade, "and I don't begrudge what I lost. Give me a light. You by corruption, it was believed, had obtained by corruption, it was believed, had obtained by corruption, it was believed, had obtained a favorable decision from a lower court. But that was only the beginning, practically, of the legal fight, and until it was ended the entate might as well be at the bottom of the Dead sea, so far as any good to Jack was concerned,

"As a mere matter of curiosity," remarked Constance, "I really would like to know what has become of him." Amy smiled knowingly.

When the winter season opened and Con-stance was back in New York, her hope re-vived, for she felt that if John Burroughs was in the city she must meet him somewhere, at theater, opera, ball, party, or some of the various bird and beast "shows" in which "excetey" deigns to affect an interest. Still, however, though she went everywhere.

still, however, though she went everywhere, she was doomed to disappointment.

One afternoon, late in spring, she and Aunt Keturah, walking up Lower Broadway from her lawyer's office, halted for a moment to look at the interesting and impressive spectacle of one of the enormous "steel frame" office buildings in course of erection. It was simply a stupendous cage, of ponder-ous columns and beams, twenty stories high. Workmen swarmed all through it; cranes on its upper line, seemingly in the sky, dropped long wire cables to the sidewalk, where men attached to them, by chains, huge forms of

Just as the ladies stopped to gaze, one o those forms, a great steel beam, was made fast, guide lines were tied on its ends, and a signal to some one controlling a hoisting engine, far aloft, caused the taughtening of the cable. At the same instant one of the work men, a stalwart young fellow in his shirt sleeves, sprang nimbly on the beam, seized the cable to steady himself and was carried up with the ascending weight.
"Oh! My gracious!" exclaimed Aunt Keturah in alarm. "He will be killed! I'm sure he will!" Her excitement prevented her observed that her excitement prevented the control of the control of her observing that her niece also uttered a cry and caught the lamp post beside her for fear of fainting. And Constance's emotion could hardly be wondered at. For in that young man, exposed to what in her eyes was deadly peril, she recognized John Burroughs. It seemed impossible, but it was true, she could not be mistaken. While they still gazed, with the fascination of horror, the beam reached the top of the structure, stopped, and the young man, care-man who seemed to be in authority, and in fact was the superintendent of construction, and fairly exploded to him: "You've got to find some other way of having that work done. In the name of humanity, I protest against it." The superintendent, a large, deliberate, ru minating sort of creature, stared in surprise

As he comprehended her, a smile spread, slow and broad, over his big face, and he replied: "The guide ropes steer the beam. He had nothing to do with that. He simply went up that way because he had business at the top of the building and that was easier than climbing nineteen flights of ladders. It was his own choice."

"His own choice!" gasped Aunt Keturah. 'Mercy! What a daredevil!'
"Not at all," answered the superintendent;
"It is perfectly safe, if the man is cool and his grip good, provided no accident happens."

While they were still talking the young man came down to them, standing on the big hook at the end of the cable, and reported taken. That irregular beam is the wrong one. Its angle is 27 degrees. The one required must have 34. The right one has not

"I wish you would ask Mr. Marcy for the number, if you can find him." "He is up there now."
"Good. Get the number and I'll telephone o the works for it, at once."

Constance's emotion was hardly to be wondered at fore. He was not fifty feet above the sidewalk, when it was clearly apparent to those looking on that something was wrong with the holsting engine at the top of the structure. The ascent was much more rapid than usual, and its speed was momentarily accelerated. It seemed as if the engineer had lost control. Should he have done so, the inev-itable result would be the hoisting of the beam to the head of the crane and the giving way of something, under continuance of the terrific strain, with the consequent fall of the had his way they'd never have stopped long beam to the street. John Burroughs realized enough in one place for letters to caten an object of them up. And you are getting to be not alarmed. He waited until he was sure that something had gone wrong, then gathered was been may be in Dan, or Beersheba, or ered himself for a spring to one of the platered up by them, coolly calculating what allowance he would have to make for the momentum to avoid having his brains dashed out by a beam instead of alighting on the platform beneath it. Of course, if he missed the platform or was shot beyond it into one of the vast interior chasms of the skeleton-like structure, that would be the end of him. Finally he leaped, clutched a column as he flew, and hung dizzy way and the beam plunged downward, going with a thunderous roor through the sidewalk timbering into the deep excavation below.

"But he must turn up somewhere during the summer," thought Constance, "and I will find him yet." But that hope was faint by the well informed.

He said: "Dear Friend and Comrade: I knew on Sunday that all was lost, but had not the courage to tell you. I have placed George and Lilly to tell you. I have placed George and Lilly with a German woman who lives on Twenty-first street, three doors south of Clark. What I want you to do is to see if you cannot place them in the Soldiers' Orphan asylum, and, Al, use your influence with Mr. Asquith to give them a pair of shoes.
